Figures/images in your report that you have not created yourself

1. You must always specify the origin (such as website, journal article, book, friend/colleague etc.) of the figure/image. You do this by referring to the source in your reference list along with all other references.

2. You must always have permission from the originator if you wish to use copyrighted figures/images in your essay.
   a. Contact the author or publisher.
   b. When you have received permission (could also be oral) - preserve/note so you can refer to it if you would be asked.

Always assume that the figure/image you want to use in your report is copyright protected. If nothing is written next to the image, the latter is protected for any use unless you asked for and received permission from the originator. For scientific journal articles the case is almost always that the organization that publishes the journal, such as Nature Publishing Group, or the American Physical Society, owns the copyright and you must ask the publisher for permission to use the image.

Creative commons (CC) is a type of copyright where the creator/originator of a work permits that the material is used under certain conditions – i.e. that you refer to the source; that you do not change the picture; that you do not charge for the work in which you are using the picture. Another concept is public domain. Works with this designation are free to use. You should still specify its source when it is not you who made the image (otherwise you are guilty of plagiarism). Pictures on Wikimedia Commons all have a CC-license or are designated as public domain.

Keep in mind!

Before you start writing:

- You are liable for how you reuse other people's figures/images in your report.
- You are liable for referring and citing other people’s work correctly in your report.

When your report is complete and approved:

- You are responsible for registering and uploading your report in LUP Student Papers http://libguides.lub.lu.se/diploma_students.
- When you upload your report in LUP you will be asked to confirm that your text does not violate copyright laws. This means that you must have permission to use copyrighted images in your report.
There are different levels of access to your report via LUP:

1. Open Access = Freely available to all via the Internet*.
2. LU/LTH = Available within the University campus (LU/LTH).
3. Author/Reviewer/Administrator = Available only to you as an author and the system’s administrators.

* This level of access to your report is recommended. However, your supervisor of the report as well as you as an author of the report both have the right to decide to not make it open access via LUP Student Papers.

CHECKLIST – make sure you have done the right thing using other people’s figures/images in your report.

- I’m only using figures/images that I have created myself or helped to create and which are previously unpublished.
- I am using one or more unpublished figures/images that my course mates have created but I have their permission. I have written 'Courtesy of NN' next to the image/figure.
- I have used figures/images designated with 'public domain' and I have specified the source of the image.
- I have used figures/images licensed under Creative Commons but I have acted in accordance with the terms of the license and referred to the source where I found the picture.
- I have used one or more copyright-protected figures/images but I have permission from the publisher/company/creator, relevant in this case.
- I want to use a figure/image and sought permission to use it but not had a reply - I need to find a different picture, or make my own.
- I want to use a figure/image whose creator I have not been able to trace - I need to find a different picture, or make my own.
